Once upon a time, there was a swan that had striking golden feathers. The swan lived in a pond next to a house. In that dilapidated house, lived a poor woman and her two daughters. The swan saw that the poor mother had great difficulty making ends meet as they had no money to buy food.

The swan thought, "If I give them my golden feathers, the mother can sell them. She and her daughters can live in comfort with the money raised from it." Soon, the swan flew to the poor woman's house. On seeing the swan inside the house, the woman said, "Why have you come here? We have nothing to offer you." 5

The swan replied, "I have not come to take anything. Instead, I will give my golden feathers to you one at a time and you can sell them. With the money, you and your daughters can live in comfort." After saying this, the swan shed one of her feathers and flew away. The swan visited the woman often and would leave a feather behind. 10

The mother and her daughters led a better life after selling the feathers that they received from the golden swan. They could buy nutritious food and clothes. One day, she said to her daughters, "We cannot trust this swan. She may fly away and never come back. If this happens, we will be poor again. We must take all her feathers the next time she comes." 15

That evening, the swan returned. The mother caught her and pulled out all of her feathers. Immediately, the swan's feathers turned into ordinary ones. The mother was shocked! 20

"I wanted to help you but now my feathers are of no value to you. I shall leave this place and never return," said the tearful swan as she left the house. The mother felt ashamed of her greed and her distrust towards the swan.

It was Mother's Day and I was buying groceries at the nearby supermarket with my five-year-old son, Tony. While we were leaving the supermarket, we heard a commotion at the entrance. Tony, who was a curious boy, wanted to know what was happening.

When we got to the entrance, we saw an elderly lady sitting on the floor. Apparently, only minutes earlier, she had fallen and hit her head on the cold, concrete floor. The elderly lady had a deep gash at the back of her head. She was embarrassed and clearly in shock. 5

As Tony watched on, he became upset about what had happened. He said to me, "Mum, it's not much fun falling over in front of everyone."

In front of the supermarket, a charity group had set up a stall to sell flowers to raise funds for needy children. Tony suggested that we buy the elderly lady a stalk of flower so we went over to the stall to buy one. 10

By this time, the paramedics had arrived and was trying to render the lady first aid. As we walked up to her, Tony became very intimidated by the blood and the medical equipment. He wanted to give the flower to the lady but he was too self-conscious.

Instead, I gave the flower to the elderly lady's husband and said, "My son felt sorry for your wife and wanted to give her this flower to make her feel better." 15

At that, the old man started to tear and said, "Thank you very much. You have a thoughtful son. Happy Mother's Day to you."

The man bent down and gave the flower to his wife, telling her whom it was from. Despite being badly hurt and shaken, the elderly lady looked at Tony. She smiled at him and said, "Thank you very much." 20
