Over the centuries, there have been many mysteries that no one has been able to unravel. Even with technological advances, there remains certain mysteries that cannot be solved. This is because not enough people have experienced the phenomenon and lived to tell the story. For example, the Bermuda Triangle has mystified scientists for ages. Knowing the dangers of the place, no one is able to conduct an experiment to find out more. Even more mysterious are perhaps past events of which no reliable evidence has been found. For example, certain tribes have suddenly vanished without a trace. Reports on the reasons for their disappearance are merely guesses- no one knows for sure. These difficulties impede our ability to solve mysteries.

Flip over for our free tips on having great ideas for writing!

The Process of Creative Writing

The six steps to having great ideas are:

Step 1 – Gather your information

Gather information by observing people and the world around you. Take interest in how people live, what they think and why they behave in a certain way. Also, read widely. Read the newspapers as well as novels. Do your research and write down interesting facts.

Step 2 – Sift through the information

See how all the information can fit together. Find the link between some of them. While doing this, you may have more ideas coming to you. The more you sift through the information, the better you understand it and the more ideas you will have.

Step 3 – Let the information grow

The next stage is to let the information grow and develop in your mind. It's a good idea to do something else for a while. Listen to some music or go for a walk to relax to stimulate your imagination and emotions.

Step 4 – The magical moment! Let the ideas flow

It's at this stage that you will know what you want to write about. The ideas will just flow spontaneously. However if it does not happen, keep writing down the ideas that you have. Be patient. The magical moment will happen.

Step 5 – Shape your idea

Shape your idea into something real. This is the climatic point of your writing.

Step 6 – Share your idea

Show your idea to others and see what they think. They may be able to add to it and make it better. They may introduce new ideas, and so the process becomes even more creative!

For each question from 21 to 28, shade your answer (1, 2, 3 or 4) on the Optical Answer Sheet. (8 marks)

Throughout evolution, daytime has been for nourishment and nighttime for fasting. Our organs _____ evolved accordingly. Digestive juices flow in a predictable pattern _____ the course of 24 hours, enabling the organs _____ function together. Our modern world of late-night takeaway and snack-filled pantries threatens to disrupt this pattern.

In laboratories _____ the world, researchers are developing a completely new understanding of how _____ metabolism works. It seems that our bodies are designed to process food most efficiently _____ it is eaten during daylight hours. Harvard neuroscientist, Frank Scheer, recognises that our bodies respond differently to calories consumed at different times of the day. That means a habit _____ simple as eating at night, compared with eating meals during the day, may cause some people to gain weight.

A research team led _____ a leading expert studied how the timing of food intake affects health. Mice _____ are allowed to eat during a 9-12 hour period during their active phase are drastically healthier than mice that are allowed to eat over a 24-hour period.

When unhealthy, snack-around-the-clock mice are put on a strict schedule that allows _____ to consume food only during their active phase, they become healthier. This encouraging finding is likely to reduce the severity of diseases just by changing when people eat.

I was awash with a wave of unfamiliarity as I was making my way to my client's house along Leith Street. Sights of modernity greeted me and I had to clear my mind for a brief moment before I could take in the whitewashed terrace and semi-detached units. To my relief, the trail of algae-blackened concrete tiles that led to my childhood home was intact. Worried that my pristine white shoes would be tainted by the mud, I gingerly set my foot on each tile.

The trail of tiles led me to yet another terraced house. Beside it was a tall and sturdy Angsana tree that stood the test of time and weather. It was the only one that stayed behind to guard my precious home, or what I used to call home. Gone was the attap hut I used to live in. The muddy ground at the entrance of the house was now lined with marbled tiles. I pushed down the lump in my throat and closed my eyes, summoning the scene from three decades ago.

10

"Joo Kun? Is that you?" a raspy voice startled me and broke my train of thought. I whipped round, with a frown wrinkling my forehead. The man had an unusual-looking ear. The ridge in the upper half of his left ear was raised and flattened.

15

Recognising my childhood friend, I exclaimed, "Siong! How have you been?" My eyes continued to be riveted on him as I recalled the story about his ear. Siong's mother had an unusual punishment for Siong. If he had not done a chore or if he had misbehaved, she would grasp his upper ear between her thumb and index finger and give it a sharp twist. This frequent action gradually imprinted itself on Siong's ear. He would tell this story to the villagers when they asked about his ear, and they would take pity on him. Truth was, he was born with it and he tried to conceal the fact with the story. Siong never once revealed the truth to me. It was his brother who had let me in on this secret in exchange for a bag of marbles.

20

"My father and I have returned to revisit the past," Siong sighed as he placed his palm on my shoulder. "This place has changed so much. My father is sitting on the old bench along the pavement and that is one of the few things that remained. Go over and say hi to him."

25

"Only three things were unchanged," I muttered to myself. I walked along the trail of concrete tiles and stood on a piece of my childhood. I closed my eyes once again and a scene from the past reappeared before me. Clustered near several attap houses were chicken coops and vegetable plots. Siong and I would often play with spiders and marbles under our old companion- the Angsana tree.

30

I slowly opened my eyes and diverted my gaze to the silhouette on the old bench. The muffled sobs grew louder as I walked towards Uncle Lai Ping. Placing my arm over his shoulder, I asked gently, "Uncle, why are you in tears?"

35

"Things will never be the same again," he said in between sobs as he pointed at the massive terrace and semi-detached houses that lined up like silent sentinels.
