Animal Fable

How the Zebra Got His Stripes?

Long ago, when animals were still new on earth, the weather was very hot, and there was very little water left in pools and pans. One of these was guarded by a boisterous baboon, who claimed that he was the 'Lord of the water' and forbade anyone from drinking at his pool.

When a zebra and his som came down to have a drink, the baboon, who was sitting by his fire, jumped up. 'Go away, intruders,' he barked. 'This is my pool and I am the Lord of the water.'

'The water is for everyone, not just for you, monkey-face,' retorted the zebra's son.

'If you want it, you must fight for it,' returned the baboon in a fine fury and in a moment, the two were locked in combat. Back and forth they went, until with a mighty kick, the zebra sent the baboon flying high up among the rocks of the cliff behind them. The baboon landed with a smack on his seat, and to this day he carries the bare patch where he landed.

The zebra staggered back through the baboon's fire, which scorched him, leaving stripes across his white fur. The shock sent the zebra galloping away to the grasslands, where he has stayed ever since. The baboon and his family, however, remain high up among the rocks where they bark defiance at all strangers, and hold up their tails to ease the smarting rock-burn of their bald patched bottoms.

Researchers in the US had expected male shrimps which have larger snapping claws to behave more aggressively. However, despite their (51) claw size, female shrimps snapped more often when
(52) their territory.
"We're so (53) to seeing animals in which males have larger weapons than females: bigger antlers, bigger teeth, bigger horns, etc. And in many of these species, males are more aggressive (54) females," said Dr Melissa Hughes, from the College of Charleston in South Carolina, US who led the study.
Snapping shrimps use their larger claw as a deadly weapon to kill their
(55) and opponents. They can kill with one deadly snap and
(56) known to stun potential food with a jet of bubbles by rapidly opening and (57) their larger claw.
The researchers wanted to see how different sexes use their claws to defend (58) territory. They observed these interactions and counted the (59) of snaps - a sign of aggression - by each shrimp.
In both species, female shrimps contradicted the researchers' expectations
(60) snapping more and behaving more aggressively towards other females. Conversely, males were just as (61) to both male and female intruders.

Dr Hughes admitted the reasons (62) females' more aggressive behaviour are unclear. "Female aggression has not been (63) nearly as much, so we don't understand it nearly as well,"
she told BBC Nature.
"One possibility here is that females are competing with each other for males,
(64) through direct competition by fighting over males or by defending large territories (65) that the distance between females is too large for one male to easily move between multiple females," explained Dr Hughes although she clarified that more research has to be carried out.

I was a late August evening in 1898 when the Scotsman took a ride through the newly laid track from the main road to his coffee plantation. The track was still soft and rather lumpy as well as being punishingly steep.

Wearied by the slope, Mr Robertson dismounted and began pushing his bicycle. Then he heard what sounded like a powerful creature.

"I thought it was some big game," he later told the British Central African Gazette, "but as I felt a certain amount of uneasiness, I moved away as quickly as I could."

A distance away, he took a glance behind. There, in the moonlit road, was a fully-grown lion. For a moment, man and beast stood frozen as they eyed each other warily. Then the lion charged.

"I attempted to mount my bicycle but owing to the slope and my excitement, I failed twice," said Mr Robertson. "Once I succeeded, I pedalled for all I was worth."

15

Off he rode, every muscle straining to coax the most speed from his rickety bicycle. But when he risked another look, he was perturbed to see that not only was the lion still in pursuit but the gap between them had been halved.

20

"I think I could easily have outstripped him if it had been level ground, but the machine kept up a rattle over the uneven track, and once or twice I was almost thrown off."

At the point when the lion was almost close enough to leap and dine on the Scotsman, Mr Robertson made it to the crest of the hill and got a kindly kick from gravity.

He tore down the slope, using every inch of his strength to keep from being thrown off and steered so hard that his knuckles turned white. Suddenly he remembered a short cut - a sewerage canal. There was no time to dismount, so he rode right into it, his bicycle bouncing off a curb and the shock flung him out of the saddle, but thankfully he fell back on it.

"It was the kind of stunt performed by men who worked as stunt doubles," recounted Mr Robertson who survived and emerged from the tunnel unscathed, so but the same could not be said for his bicycle.	30
That was when he realised that the blood-curdling growl had faded away to silence. Whether exhausted or bored, the lion was nowhere to be seen.
The Edinburgh Evening News later called it "one of the most extraordinary adventures of a Scotsman." The Illustrated Police News billed the story as a "Mad Ride For Life"	35
As for Mr Robertson, he had learnt his lesson. "No more moonlight rides for me," he vowed.
