Read the passage below and answer questions 26 to 30.

My father woke up first. He came into the room yelling, "Jack! Wake up! The Boat House is on fire!"

I tumbled out of bed. Fear instantaneously cleared the fog from my head. Smoke drifted in my window and made me hurry to my father. We ran downstairs and hurried to the back porch. A wild rushing jet of flame was shooting out of the window on the side of the Boat House. Smoke billowed into the night and blew across into the yard at us. The heat made my face prickly.

"Dad! We need water," I cried.

"Too late," he said. "She's gone, Jack."

We walked down to the sand and watched the front doors. Smoke curled out from under them. The windows blew out and flames licked up along the old red paint

My father held me tight in his arms as we watched our Boat House burn. I cried as the noise of the cracking wood got louder. Then the roof sagged on one side and dropped with a whoosh of sparks and flames.

The fire trucks came way too late and sprayed water on a pile of blackened wood. When the hoses were back in the trucks, a fireman came over to my father.

"That's a funny kind of fire Mr. Spence. I don't much like the way that one started."

He turned to face the smouldering wreck. Two spots of intensity front and back. "You didn't have two short-circuits going on at the same time, I suspect."

"You think it was set on purpose?"

"My hunch is arson, Mr. Spencer." The fireman opened his big yellow jacket to let in the cool night air.

"That's our whole business, sir. Our workshop, tools, boat. Everything."

"Any insurance on the place?" the fireman asked in a soft voice.

"Not recently. We've only had a few boats to build."

"I understand Mr. Spencer, we'll check it out during the week and let you know what we find." The fireman turned and climbed up the hill to his truck

Later, that night we sat on the ground near the charred pile.

"I don't even want to say what I'm thinking," whispered my father.

"Me, either," I said.

He dug a twig into the ground twisting it and snapping it

"Are you alright, Jack?"

"I guess I don't know, Dad."

"We'll pull out the tools that may have survived on the morning. Nothing more we can do."

"It was our best boat yet."

"She was. We'll figure out how to start over again."

"The boat?"

"The business. There's no money to fall back on"

"Yeah. Not enough people like wooden boats to make us rich."

"That's right. But we like them."

"We sure do."

(67) The school buses arrived late. This caused a massive traffic jam at dismissal.

The late _____

(68) Mrs. Wong said, "Children, don't leave your belongings in the hall tomorrow morning." ^{the next}

Mrs Wong told _____

(69) My classmates are not participating in the parade this year. Neither am I.

Neither _____

(70) Nobody expected him to appear suddenly.

His sudden _____

A huge and overripe fruit had made a direct hit on my brother's head. His shout of pain and continual groaning after, made me into a hysterical wreck, rolling on the ground. I laughed until the tears came hard, almost blinding me.

Then seeming to join in the fun, a kookaburra in a nearby tree started a raucous chuckle, which rose to a full pitch just as though, he, too, saw the joke

In anger, my elder brother brought up his slingshot and fired blindly at the sound "Laugh at me, will you!" he called out. He had not even taken time to aim. Our laughter was cut short by the fall of the kookaburra to the ground.

My brother, horrified, his anger gone, climbed down and we gathered around the stricken bird. That wild aim had broken the bird's wing beyond repair. We looked at each other in frightened silence, knowing full well what we had done. We had broken that strict rule of Aboriginal law. We had killed for the sake of killing and we had destroyed a bird we were forbidden to destroy

The Aborigine does not eat the kookaburra. His merry laughter is allowed to go unchecked for he brings happiness to the tribes. We call him our brother and friend

15

We did not see our father coming towards us. He must have been looking for firewood. When he came upon us, we parted to allow him to see what had happened. He checked his anger by remaining silent and continued doing what he had first come into the jungle for. Mercifully, he put the stricken bird out of our misery. Then, he ordered us home.

On the way back, we talked with great foreboding of the punishment we knew would come. I wished our father would beat us, but we both knew it would not be a quick punishment. Besides, Father never beat us. No, we knew punishment would be carefully weighed to fit the crime.

It was our mother who ordered us to bring our bandicoot traps, our slingshots, and every other weapon we had into the backyard. We had to place them in a heap in the yard, while our father carefully checked every item.

25

Father spoke for the first time since we had killed the kookaburra. He asked for no excuses for what we had done and we did not offer any. We must all take the blame. That is the way of the Aborigine. Since we had killed for the sake of killing, the punishment was that we could not hunt or use our weapons. For three months we would eat only the white man's rations.

30

It happened a long time ago. Yet, in my dreams, the sad, suffering eyes of the kookaburra, our brother and friend, still haunts me.
